EDITOR'S NOTE

From the day I was elected as the Editor-in-Chief, only one mission ruled my mind–let's make every student at least take a glimpse at this publication. As a senior, I know brutally well how onerous life in KMLA is. Many students may be too fatigued to even glance through the packed English paragraphs. With this unfortunate reality in mind, this edition of the Minjok Herald is largely centered around the effort to make this student newspaper more accessible, digestible, and enjoyable to all KMLA students. In this edition of Minjok Herald, we've inserted crossword puzzles and comic strips with the hopes of motivating more students to peruse through the articles and discover the insights beneath. The very value of Minjok Herald (and other student publications) is predicated on the spirited responses from attentive readers. So, I urge you to be Readers first in order to be Leaders of any stimulating discourse.

Readers, we live in a world riddled with distractions that pull us away from heeding sensitive social problems. Pondering is deemed luxury and rumination is deemed a burden. The realm of politics and religion has become ever more polarizing; world leaders are fomenting divisiveness by groundlessly alleging that all media is fake. What's ever more direly needed in this havoc, I say, is just a gentle knock on others' doors.

Knock and turn the door knob–then the doors to the rushing wave of understanding, empathy, and connection would soon open.

Knocking, in this sense, is reading about others' lives. That single trial to openness is something so many of us fail to attempt nowadays.

Articles–whether it be news, editorials, or feature–enables us to view the world through a kaleidoscope of nuances and contexts. The multifaceted society, once written into the carefully chosen words of passionate journalists, could be imbued with empathy with the final knock of the readers heading towards harmony.

So, Readers, I beseech you to gently knock on the doors to the diverse aspects of our school by reading this Minjok Herald that you're holding! :)

The Beginning of a Long Journey

Alteration of the School Uniforms

Korean Minjok Leadership Academy(KMLA) is known for its idiosyncratic uniform. KMLA uses hanbok, the Korean traditional dress as the official school attire. Students in their lengthy Durumagis—traditional Korean overcoats—flapping their coattails as they walk to the gym every Monday morning is an exotic scene only found in KMLA. Traditionally, the proper Korean attire for men is baggy, flowing pants and long, voluminous skirts for women. KMLA, from its founding, strictly adhered to the traditional dress code that requires all women to wear skirts and men to wear pants without any exception.

On the beginning of the first semester, Ko Eun-Ji, a 21st waver, made a speech addressing the inconvenience of the skirt uniform during the weekly morning assembly. The speech focused on how the lengthiness, unwieldiness, and inflexibility of skirt uniforms hinder female students from moving freely. She elaborated further by explaining that students often trip over their long skirts, some ending up in wheelchairs for an entire semester. Moreover, she claimed that the hazards of the unwieldy skirts are magnified when students are using the stairs. She reminded the audience that there always have been students severely hurt after tumbling over their skirts on their way running to honjeong. This speech ignited the debate over the strict gender binary pronounced in KMLA's school uniform.

The starkly differing stances upheld by the students and the school administration seemed to have no common grounds for compromise. Since the school firmly maintained a conservative standpoint on female school uniforms, the process of negotiation was indeed an uphill fight for students. Some students established a voluntary student organization, under the motto of 'All Uniforms for all.' The group selected one female and male student as representatives: Park Ji-su and Lim Jung-woo. The group planned various collective actions such as displaying hand-written posters that calls for the the change of school uniforms and organizing a female-male uniform switching campaign. The constant effort of the student group had achieved a remarkable feat at last: the school announced that they would establish an official school uniform committee. The committee was made up of teachers, parents, and the female and male student representatives of the student group. The school, by including student representatives in the panel, aimed to reflect the general opinion shared among the KMLA students. Even though the changes were not as rapid or drastic as some students hoped for, reorganizing the school uniform committee was, in fact, an event marking astonishing progress compared to the other numerous decisions that school has made in recent years.

The committee has set a direction to shorten the lengthy skirts. On October 3rd, the School uniform committee conducted a survey on the new design of the uniform through Google Form. Based on the poll, the committee presented new skirt designs which were notably shorter than past ones. On October 28th, the committee discussed about the new sample skirts in more depth.

The active feedback from the school administration and school uniform committee as a response to the students' grievances seems to be the promising stepping stone to changing the school uniform for the better. Though the committee faces further challenges of coordinating the disputing ideas of students and the school administration, the students' support and interest for the school uniform committee would definitely help the committee to beget positive changes in the near future.

A New Member of KMLA

Interview with Jung Jae-Woong

A newcomer rarely knocks on KMLA's door. In KMLA's tightly knit student community, we often interact within the same batch of students for three years. Nonetheless, this year, KMLA has recruited two transfer students. Minjok Herald decided to meet one of them and identify what led this student to transfer to KMLA and examine how the diverse aspects of KMLA would look like in the perspective of the new member.

MH | What led you to transfer to KMLA?
Actually, I did not know well about KMLA. After I failed to enroll in a science high school, I had lots of time to seriously consider about my future and personal interests. These considerations led me to participate in competition called ITC. There, I met KMLA seniors and suddenly felt that I was only a small fish in such a small pond. After the competition, I searched for KMLA in the internet and coincidentally read the notice on accepting transfer students. Finally, notwithstanding the short time for preparation, I decided to apply for KMLA.

MH | What was the most captivating aspect of KMLA?
The aspect of KMLA that I found the most appealing was the "Free grade, Free track" classes. Even though free grade classes are not fully implemented in KMLA, free track education still seems to work quite effectively. When I prepared for a science high school, I only had to focus on math and science fields. However, humanities courses provided me with a new, captivating sort of experience that I couldn't experience in sciences. KMLA in this sense allows me to study both fields freely. Especially, I'm looking forward to taking courses on philosophy and politics. Not only the style of education, but also the motto of KMLA inspired me. Although many KMLA students complain that motto is too far fetched from how the school's system actually works, I still believe that most students in KMLA are still studying for their genuine interest compared to students from ordinary high schools. The passion of KMLA students always drove me to learn more from my peers. Since KMLA students are the most outstanding students in South Korea, the slot presented for me provided me an invaluable opportunity to absorb diverse advantages.

MH | What was the most captivating aspect of KMLA?
Since I am a transfer student, forming relationships with new friends was the most difficult part for me. KMLA students already spent 8 months together, which meant they have stronger bonds and friendships based on richer memories. It seemed like other students also felt a bit uneasy to interact with me, too. These occasions of uneasiness made me feel lonely and often times feel a lack of belonging to the school and its people. Another hardship was entering to clubs. People say that the best part of KMLA life is the opportunity to join diverse club activities, but only a few clubs were opening slots for additional recruitment. But thankfully, I am a member of Joseon is Hangyeorye and Apple Pie. Still, I wanted to be a member of sports club such as Crossover, MVP, CGV and so on. Though I'm not currently a member of any sports club, I'm still looking forward to applying when the sports club announces for additional recruitments.

MH | Do you have any regrets of transferring to KMLA?
One word comes right to my mind. "No." I truly think it was one of the wisest decisions to transfer here. Morning Exercise allowed me to live a regular life, and classes are much better than I expected. Lastly, friends here are generally earnest and sincere. I feel that they are people that I can cooperate with, rely on when needed, and learn from as role models.

Throughout the interview, it seemed clear that Jaewoong, who has newly stepped into KMLA, was facing challenges that KMLA has thrusted upon him. Nevertheless, it also seemed evident that KMLA students were eagerly helping the newcomer to make himself at home. The new member of KMLA made manifest that he never regretted his decision to transfer and rather viewed his life in KMLA positively. Thus, we can conclude that one of KMLA's most outstanding aspects is the genuine relationship built with peers. Along the three years of dorm life, KMLA students learn to bond with very different individuals and also learn to rely on each other in times of need. These invaluable life experiences would enrich all KMLA students' lives, along with the newcomers' as well.

Meeting New People & Cultures through

The Raffles Exchange Program

Korean Minjok Leadership Academy provides its students with the opportunity to take part in various educational programs. Those programs often offer colorful and inspiring experiences for participating students. This includes the Raffles Institution (RI) Exchange Program, which is done every once a year with the freshmen. A total of ten students will be chosen from a number of applicants. Afterwards, these students will be sent to Singapore during their summer vacation for a week. During this period, students will be able to experience Singaporean culture and the difference between Singapore's and Korea's education. Afterwards, the RI students would visit KMLA and experience Korean culture, history, and education.

The Raffles Institution is a school that was founded in 1823 by Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles. It provides secondary education for boys only and pre-university education for all students. Currently the campus is located in the city of Bishan and has a total of 3,600 students. Most of the facilities are in good condition, with plenty of resources for students to use. There are currently two libraries, one Olympic size swimming pool, and a number of special facilities, including a museum dedicated to explaining the history of the school.

For the 2018 exchange, 9 freshmen were selected. KMLA students stayed at the RI from the 24th of July till the 31st of July. During this period of time, the KMLA students took Math, Biology, History classes and Physical Education. Apart from this curriculum, the teacher from the Raffles Institution provided a special lecture on photonics just for the KMLA students. Most of the programs had the intention of providing the most valuable experience to the exchange students. When not at the school, the RI students took the KMLA students on city tours. Additionally, they made detailed schedules for the weekends as to keep their Korean guests entertained. The RI students explained Singapore culture and let the KMLA students experience it together. On the last day, the RI students held a barbeque party for the KMLA students.

The RI students came to KMLA during the second semester, around September 10th. During the one week of their stay, RI students were introduced to Korean culture, just as they had done toward the KMLA students. The RI students spent most of their time taking lessons with the teachers of KMLA. By listening to Korean history, Korean archery, and Korean language classes, the students took a taste of Korean culture, and attained a unique experience. Other than taking classes, KMLA students took the RI students on tours of major cities, such as Seoul and Wonju.

During the exchange program, RI and KMLA students were brought together. These two groups of students from disparate cultural, educational backgrounds shared information with one another other and helped each other to understand their culture. They also bonded with each other as friends, continuing their friendship even after the program ended by staying in touch via social media. For students, this is a great educational opportunity as well as an extraordinary cultural experience. The participants were given the chance to enjoy the aspects of a new culture and at the same time teach others of the specialties of Korean culture. Therefore, it is unsurprising that most KMLA students that have participated in the Raffles Exchange Program, even 23rd wavers today, have described their experience as both enjoyable and educational.

THE NEW LEADERS

The 25th Student Council's reign has finally reached an end and the 26th Student Council has been newly selected to take their place. Prior to the election, students attended three question-and-answer sessions in order to better understand the candidates' election pledges along with their future policies. For the Executive Council, 3 students, Jeong Jae-Seong, Park Ha-Yeong, and Kang Tae-Jun ran for the presidency; 2 male students, Jeong Seong-Hun and Kwon Gi-Su ran for the male member and 2 female students; and Paik Yun-Yi and So Yu-Jeong ran for the female member of the Executive Council. For the Legislative Council, 3 students, Kim Rak-Young, Yoo Eo-Jin, and Ryu Hyeon-Woo ran for the presidency while only 1 male student, Jo Seong-Soo and 2 female students, Moon Seung-Min and Lee Se-Yeong ran for the members of the Legislative Council. For the Judicial Council, a whopping 5 students, Kim Go-Eun, Kim Ha-Jin, Hong Seung-Wook, Kim Hyeon-Jun(A), and Lee Seung-Yoon, ran for the presidency. The electorates were provided a summarized explanation on each candidate from each council with the analysis article from the press on the candidate's response on the candidate assignments and the question-and-answer sessions. The analysis articles provided students the opportunity to understand candidates' pledges more precisely. Ultimately, Kang Tae-Jun became the president and Jeong Seong-Hun and Paik Yun-Yi became members of the Executive Council. Ryu Hyeon-Woo was elected as the president of the Legislative Council, along with Jo Seong-Soo and Moon Seung-Min as the members of the Executive Council. For election of the Judicial Council, Kim Ha-Jin came on top, starting her presidency, whilst Kim Hyeon-Jun(A) and Lee Seung-Yoon became vice presidents. Minjok Herald News crew decided to write an article dedicated to the members of the Legislative Council: Jo Seong-Soo and Moon Seung-Min.

SCHOOL DEMOCRATIZATION

A DILIGENT WORKER

THE 25TH LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL MEMBERS

Jo Sung-Soo

Moon Seung-Min

Interview with Jo Sung-soo

Jo Sung-Soo is the male member of the Legislative Council. On his simple poster hung in the dormitory wall, he expressed his uniqueness with his motto: "Achieiving School democratization." His distinctiveness manifests more clearly in his response to the candidate assignment and the question-and-answer sessions.

The first major future plan that he has is 'School democratization.' He addresses the problem of the inequality in power within KMLA's system. Currently, there is a regulation set by the school on the process of creating new school rules- Any amendment or revision in the school rule book should be accompanied with an approval from the headmaster and the Division of Student Affairs. Jo Seong-Soo believes that this regulation resulted in a vertical relationship between the teachers and the students on central decision-making on school affairs. Jo suggests that a reformation to change this regulation needs to take place since he believes that true democracy can only be achieved by providing the equal say to the Student Council as well. He also mentioned how the reformation can better ensure the balanced representation of both the teachers and the students' opinions. But most importantly, Jo emphasizes the fact that his attempt is not simply to quarrel with the teachers but to achieve student-led democracy that could counter undemocratic demands forced upon students.

His second major plan is incorporating 'Indirect democracy' to the Assembly of Representatives. Jo criticizes the reality of KMLA student leadership by parsing that class representatives are not actively engaging in the Representatives' Assembly. He offers a solution of introducing aspects of an indirect democracy. Under his new plan, each grade will select representatives of their own, and the representatives from each grade will actively suggest and debate legislations. The grade representatives would have more say in the Assembly of Representatives and it is anticipated that the class presidents would be motivated to participate more actively with the fresh current of new members. It is expected that Jo will expand student participation, focusing on the values of a truly representative democracy.

In a separate interview, Jo Seong-Soo mentioned that his plans aren't fully finished. The methodological aspect of several policies, Jo said, are yet to be discussed. However, he is absolutely sure about core values he is willing to defend. He is sure that the school democratization will stop the Division of Student Affairs from making abrupt, undiscussed decisions. He is certain that active participation from all students in the activities led by the Legislative Council will add legitimacy to our voice, leading the school to address crucial points that ought to be discussed.

Interview with Moon Seung-Min

Moon Seung-Min is the female member of the Legislative Council. According to her candidate assignment, Moon promises to be a fair and responsible member of the legislative council dedicated to facilitating communication between the students and teachers. She mentions that she was inspired to run for the current position as she realized the rift between the students and the teachers in the 25th Legislative Council. She also found out promoting the students to actively participate in student led activities is one of the most important things to be done. In the question regarding the role of a member of the Legislative Council, she explains that organizing and running the Assembly of Representatives and class discussion is the primary responsibility. In order to be a "good" member of the Legislative Council, she parsed that one should be diligent enough to do the tasks given to him/her while establishing an open mode for communication with the school, the students, and the teachers.

Additionally, Moon Seung-Min stressed that some failures that the Legislative Council face is inevitable. From time to time, some legislation cannot be enacted although they were strongly pushed by the students. Moon explains that the Legislative Council must fully understand why the suggestion failed and why the councils from the past could not enact the changes properly.

Lastly, on the problem of apathy among the students on the student council, Moon believes that one of the main reasons for the lack of interest is because the students are too busy to invest their time. As a solution, she suggests shortening the time for the mandatory Q&A sessions during the election period, therefore imposing less burden for the students when participating.

KMLA Family Sports Day

ENDS SUCCESSFULLY DESPITE THE DELAY

On October 9th, Korean Minjok Leadership Academy (KMLA) held the KMLA Family Sports Day at the school campus. The students' parents and grandparents, siblings were invited to this athletic competition to participate together. The KMLA Family Sports Day this year was unexpectedly postponed because of the typhoon Kong-rey. Since the postponing of the Sports Day was notified only 2 days before the original scheduled date, students and their family had to go through confusion. Especially the students from regions far from KMLA voiced out complaints. One of the comments written under the facebook post that announced the delay of the Sports Day stated that the school's stance was lacking consideration for families that are coming from remote areas, which scheduled their flight or train tickets for weeks earlier in order to make it to the school on October 6th.

One student from Jeju Island commented that his family had to just give up the money they spent for the airplane ticket. Moreover, due to the delay of the annual 3 Generations Sports Day, the Korean essay contest which was originally scheduled on October 9 th had to be rescheduled to October 7 th. This change of schedule also entailed confusion among students since the Korean essay contest was held on Sunday morning, which is the time when students regularly use for religious activities. Also, the students who had plans on Sunday had to change their schedule since it is mandatory for all the students to participate in the Korean essay contest.

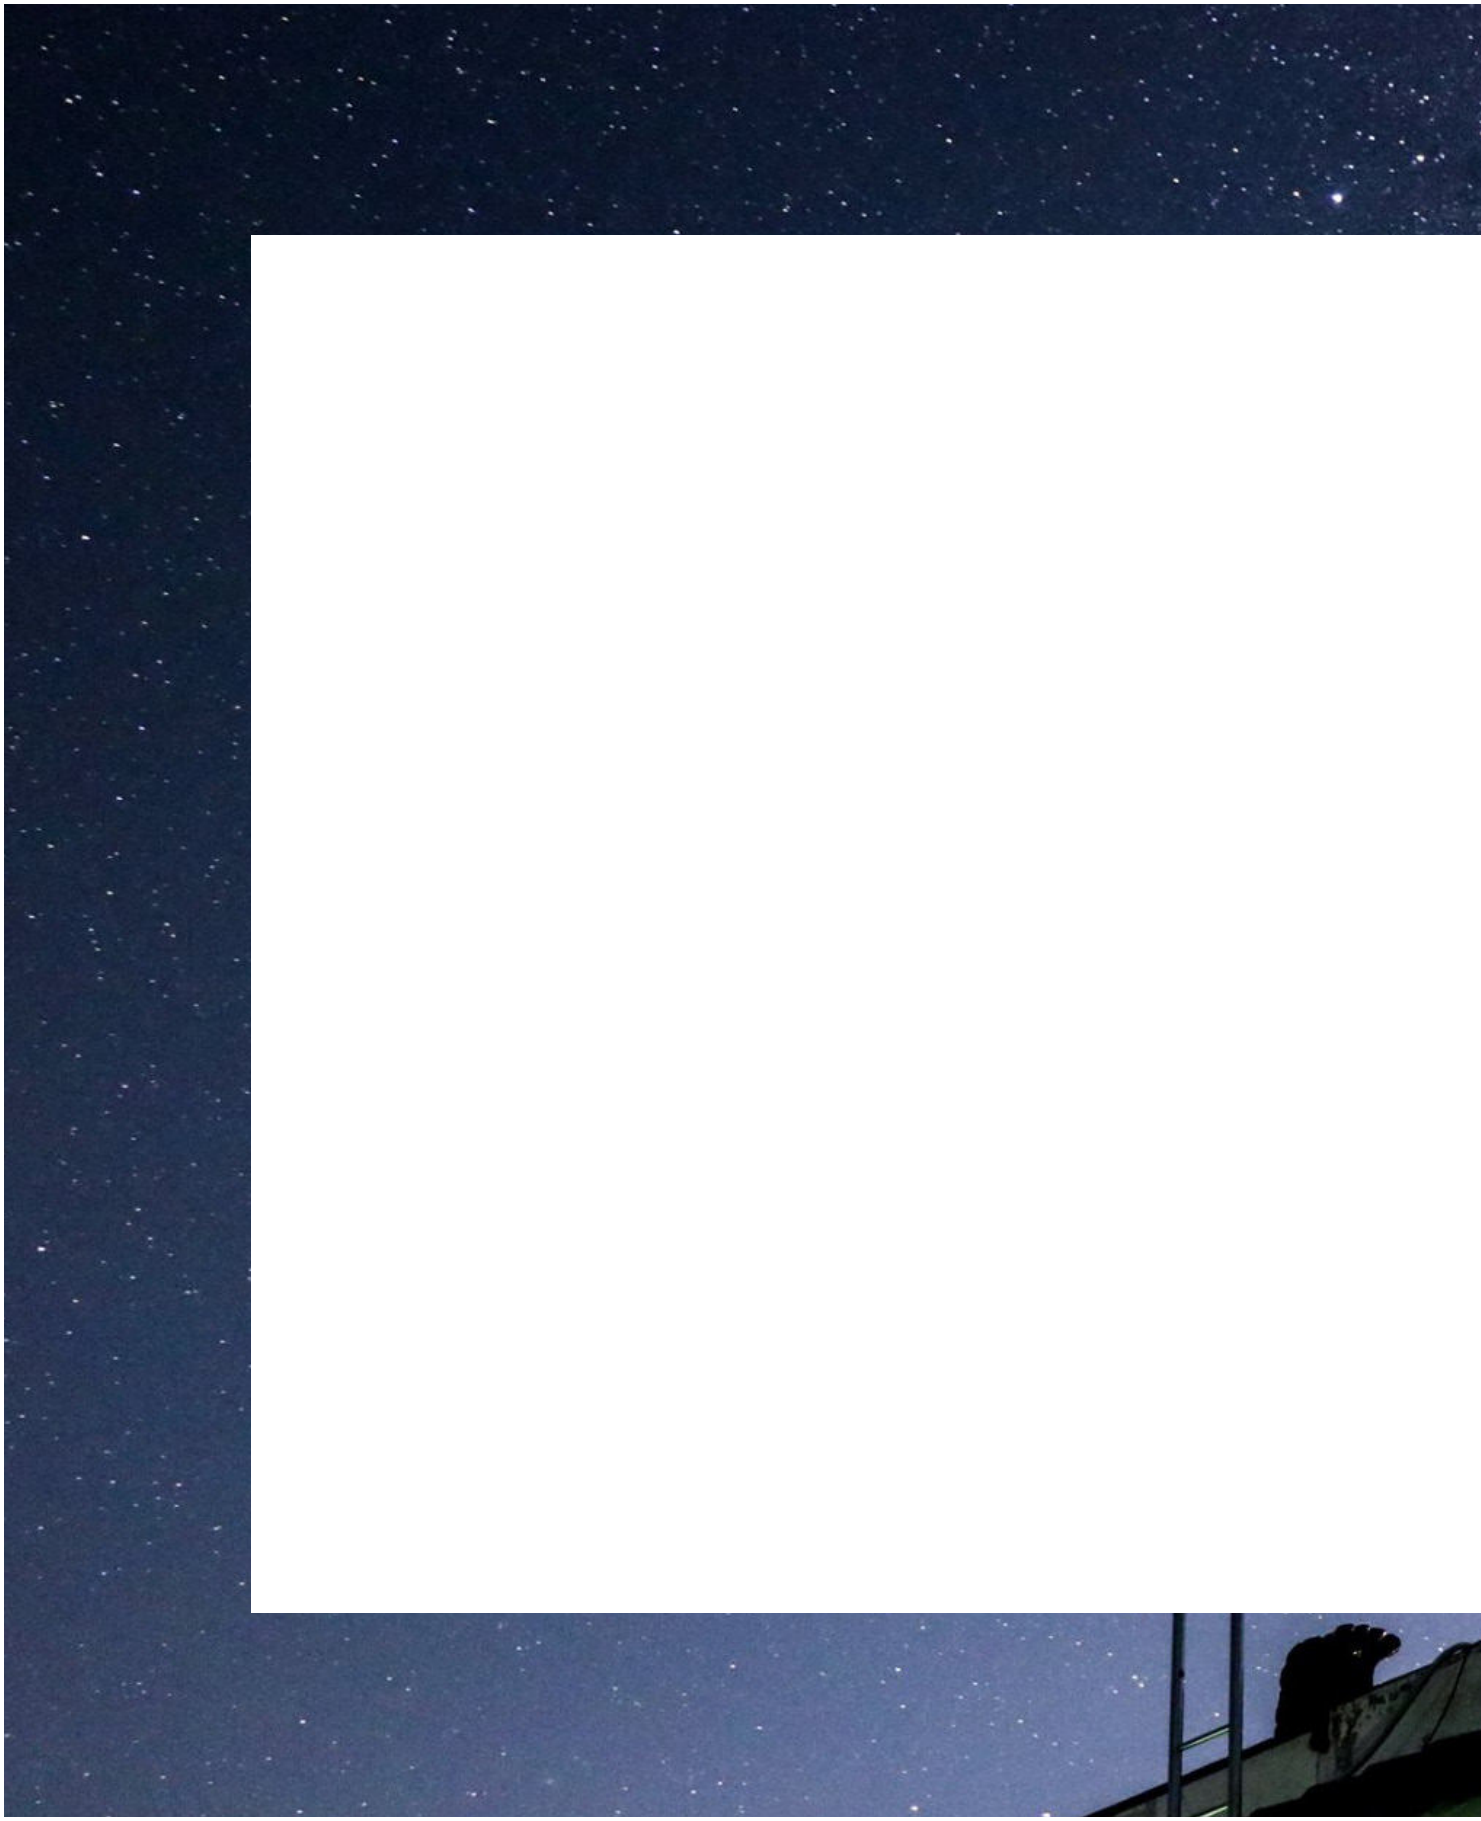

This year's KMLA Family Sports Day was held after such a confusion. Putting all the chaos aside, there were a, few alterations made to the Sports Day programs in order to revivify the event in entirety. The most conspicuous difference was how the teams were assigned.The preexisting method of dividing teams into blue and white teams was based on grades. However, this year the school decided to mix students from different grades for the unity of the school and divided teams based class numbers. Also, instead of wearing the hoodie each wave designed for vision trip, the students got a dress code to wear black or white t-shirts according to the team color, and the school provided black and white handkerchiefs to easily distinguish the teams. Furthermore, a new game was added: the rock-paper-scissors game. Each class had to stand in a line with their hands on the shoulder of the friend in front of them. Then the students would just walk around the gymnasium like a human train while the music goes on and stop in front of another class when the music stops.

Although the sports day this year faced difficulties even before it started due to the weather and other alterations made to the program, it was an opportunity to build unity among family members and among the members of the KMLA family. As this year's KMLA Family Sports proceeded with its final step, the closing ceremony, the PE teachers announced that all students would be exempted from morning exercise the day after due to the student's active and cooperative participation. Students cheered jubilantly as the finale of the 2018 KMLA Family Sports Day presented KMLA students with the best prize that they could ever get.

FEATURE

As students and faculty members come and go every year on this isolated countryside campus, there are some that leave a unique mark of their own. In some cases, their heroic tales of life in school—or their 'KMLAian-ness'—are discussed wave after wave, influencing generations of newcomers that aspire to make the most out of their stint at KMLA. In this edition of the Minjok Herald, the Feature Crew explores the stories of several members of the KMLA family who have become an integral part of the community, earning the reputable title of a 'true KLMAian.' Their own takes how they define life in KMLA—be it with their academic zeal, outstanding leadership, or unflinching passion—will no doubt serve as an exemplar for many underclassmen to chase after.

LIVING WITHOUT SNACKS

Snacks are an indispensable part of KMLA life. A nutty chocolate bar presents a saccharine refuge to a lethargic KMLA student who has just finished a tiring math quiz.

Snacks not only serve as delightful treats but also serve as a crucial part of KMLAian's sustenance. Sometimes, on "hell weeks" which students are thrust with a deadly workload, students are pushed to work on their assignments even during meal time. Then, students have no choice but to depend on an energy bar for nourishment.

As students realize the importance of having a continuous supply of snacks, KMLA students developed a unique culture of buying and selling snacks in an online Facebook group – Meok 9 Sa 9 Pal 9. The presence of this special culture tells us that snacks are an integral part of KMLA life.

We were curious about how KMLA life would be like without snacks. So, we tried to figure it out by abstaining from our cherished snack times.

DAY 0 RULES

The coauthors of this article, Min-sun and Seo-hee met to set up the rules that we pledged to keep for the five-day snack-free challenge.

<The Rules>

1. Snacks are strictly prohibited.
: The term "snack" refers to "outside" food (food the school does not officially provide to students) which includes cookies, candy bars, chips, sodas, and etc.
2. Only eating school meals is allowed.
3. Honjeong bread is also not allowed.
4. Participants should follow the above from September 11th to September 15th.

After making the rules, we started to feel very worried about the challenging five-day journey set ahead of us. Trying to reassure each other with a confident high-five, we went back to our rooms to enjoy our final feasts. We gorged on Saewookkang and potato crisps, licking off the last bits of salty crumbs on our fingers.

DAY 1 DOZING OFF EMPTY BACKPACK

I couldn't help drowsing off during the first period because I only slept for two hours the night before. I desperately rummaged my backpack pocket with my hand to find my tejava—the sweet milk tea beverage, the special potion that wakes me up—only to find it empty. Suddenly, I remembered that I gave all of my tejavas to my friends last night to stick strictly to the rules. Feeling hopeless, I pinched my arm hard to wake myself up. Even after several pinches, I found the method ineffective in keeping me awake. For a last-ditch attempt, I rose up from the chair and stood up in class to stop myself from dozing off. My final maneuver also turned out to be futile – I learned that people could sleep even while standing up. Finding a way to wake myself up without resorting to snacks seemed to be an urgent issue; I became painfully aware of it after sleeping through three classes in a row.

DAY 2 NO, NO,

Before I started this project, I did not know how much my friends eat snacks, how much my friends are generous with sharing their snacks, and how much I love eating treats. Simply watching my friends finishing a chocolate bar or taking large gulps of fresh orange juice was much more painful than I thought. Also, my friends were such magnanimous beings that they offered me a bite of their snacks every time they saw me in silent torment. Turning away from their smug smiles handing a cookie or a chip was sheer torture. Even worse, when I firmly rejected their tempting offer with a "No, thank you," they looked at me very strangely in the face and asked again if I REALLY did not want to eat. Forcing myself against the urge to answer yes, I said no again.

No, No, No, even when my heart was screeching for a YES! YES! YES!

DAY 3

NO.3

When we set up the rules on Day 0, I didn't know that abstaining from eating honjeong bread will torment me this much. However, when I got off the elevator on the 12th floor after honjeong by mistake and saw trays of crusty bread, I instantly got out of my mind. I was craving for the fresh bread so much that I was close to just picking up one and devouring it. I had held back myself miraculously by spurting towards the fridge and violently munching on the ice I shoveled from the dispenser. However, it was much harder to control myself that day: honjeong bread was a soft roll cake, and my eyes were immediately transfixed to its sunlight-yellowish shade. Within the layers of golden bread, the sweet and sour jam was spread all over with raisins spangled like purple stars. Just imagining myself biting into the soft bread was enough to make my mouth water. My brain was shouting at me to grab the bread and stuff it right into my mouth. I stood there still for a minute, about one meter from the bread, trying not to stretch my hand towards it. Then, I saw the other participant of this experiment, Minseon, passing by with a tired and depressed face. I bet my face looked similar to hers. Suddenly, she noticed me standing by the bread trays. After a short, gloomy eye contact, she opened her mouth and started to mumble something.

"I think, I think we can eat honjeong bread. At least it's not outside food."

After a few minutes, I was enjoying mouthfuls of the precious roll cake with Minseon. We agreed to alter rule number three– Honjeong bread was allowed after all.

DAY 4

THE SCHOOL MEAL

To survive in KMLA without snacks, it is crucial to eat every school meal. If you miss any of the meals, you surely would get knocked out by the hunger and fatigue creeping throughout the day. However, I couldn't eat dinner that day because the audition for Minjok Music Festival was just around the corner. I had to go the practice with the other club members instead of enjoying the last meal of the day. After the practice, it was almost 6:50, which meant that I had to run to the dormitory. Running at full speed with a loaded backpack (which had a 1000 page Campbell Biology book inside) without eating anything for hours was an immensely stressful experience. When I arrived at my room, still panting for breath, I slumped onto my chair and put my head down on the cold desk. The fact that there was still two hours left to eat honjeong bread struck me painfully.

DAY 5

LAST DAY

I was very excited because it was the last day that I had to endure without eating snacks. Although I got slightly more accustomed to the snack-free life compared to the first day, refraining from snacks was still exhausting and stressful. Notwithstanding, I urged myself to bear the last day because I knew I would be able to cherish snacks as usual by tomorrow. Though my friends lured me with chocolate and candies, I shoved the temptation away. Hours later, the challenge was over at last.

After going through the tough five-day challenge without snacks, we figured out that we had greatly underestimated the difficulty of the project; we both thought that living several days without snacks would not be such a big deal. Through this unique experience, we truly realized how confectionery and snacks played an essential role in keeping us sane and full in KMLA. Moreover, we promised to be more thankful from now on for the snacks we eat daily, sincerely enjoying every bite of it. Living without snacks was obviously an arduous challenge, but at the same time, it was a valuable experience that made us rethink about the presence of the things we had always taken for granted.

LIVING WITHOUT A PHONE

WHAT ROLE DOES YOUR PHONE REALLY PLAY IN YOUR LIFE?: HYUNBIN AND SEOLIN'S EXPERIENCE

DAY 1 ARE WE GOING TO MAKE IT THROUGH THIS?

The first day without a smartphone has started. Only an hour has passed since I put my phone into the box. It was slightly irritating not to have the best device for instant messaging resting in my palms. Nonetheless, after all, I had my laptop that let have access to Facebook, so it wasn't awfully unbearable. Frankly speaking, I'm more than excited to have an opportunity to change myself into a person who is free from the manacles of SNS. Maybe this would be a helpful motivation for me to create healthier study habits. If the experiment turns out to be successful, I will recommend my friends to join the challenging experience for a few days.

DAY 2 BE IN TOUCH

Now it's the second day of the record. Today, I had a hard time contacting my family and friends. Since I'm living away from my parents in a dormitory (especially in a far countryside like Hoengseong), I text them and call them often even when there is no special occasion. Also, because I normally text my friends to keep close relationships with them, I had to constantly explain why I was late on replying their messages. Moreover, I started to build a new habit: talking about everything necessary whenever I met my friends in person. I had to stay prepared to initiate the conversation at any time, conveying the message that I had to tell them. What I'm worried about wasn't the possibility of ignoring the messages from my close friends; I'm concerned about missing the truly important contacts from organizations or contests that I have participated. Putting the problem of slowed communication aside, all the other aspects of my life were surprisingly not interrupted by the absence of the phone that much.

DAY 3 NOW REALIZING SOMETHING

I reached three fourth mark of my challenge. I, like many others at this school, used to never let go of my phone, even in bed. I'm still not used to this life, but I'm getting there: only after pulling myself out of it had I realized just how exasperating the constant buzz of digital conversations going about in my hand was. In a somewhat ironic matter, I feel privileged. I have an excuse to reply to people's texts slower than before. I don't have multiple texts screaming at me on the screen. As long as I keep my laptop closed, I have no idea what's going on, which sometimes feels nice instead of being frustrating.

DAY 4 THE FINAL DAY

It's finally the fourth and last day of the experiment. Without my phone, I've successfully gone through more than twelve hours without the Internet, which I would have previously deemed impossible. However, this feat had its consequences. I accidentally missed a meeting with my friend, who had been spamming me with text to make me remember. Even more, people have come up to me demanding a reason as to why I did not return their calls. Each time, my response was the same. The experiment was finally over. I eagerly reached into the box to retrieve my prize.

DAY 5 CONCLUSION

When I first decided to conduct this experiment, with the participant being myself, I thought it would be no big of a deal. It wasn't like my laptop couldn't offer anything that my phone could, except calls or texts. But quickly did I realize that it wasn't about the communication itself. It was about how it was done. Even when walking from one school building to another, I just had to check my phone, with my meager data treacherously turned on, in case anyone sent me anything important. Nine out of ten times, it didn't happen. We, as a population, have been so absorbed into the unnaturally rapid nature of digital communication that we've been letting it consume us instead. Even the most intricate information is copied and shared within a matter of seconds. It's almost too convenient. And maybe it doesn't have to be that way.

LIVING WITHOUT TRASH

DAY ZERO

On every Tuesday and Friday, the typically filthy dorm rooms of KMLA go through a regular turnover. Students, on the clean up check day, are made to clean their dormitory rooms according to their designated positions. Some have to vacuum their rooms; some have to scrub the tiles in the shower. The coauthors of this article (both as room representatives) had to throw away the garbage stack that had been piling up in the room for three days. As if that was not enough, some of my roommates went out to Sosa on the weekends just to bring in massive piles of garbage. I was astounded by the unbelievably large amount of trash thrown away by only six people: it nudged me to come up with an idea for the "living without" project. Our project banned making trash for four days while keeping track of every piece of inevitably created garbage. At first, we thought that not having snacks would solve the issue, but the amount of garbage created every day was way more than expected. In our experiment, we wanted to trace the types of trash we throw away the most.

DAY 1: 9TH SEPTEMBER 15, 2018

The first day of the project took place on a Saturday. I woke up late, took a shower, and checked the lunch menu- the typical weekend routine for a KMLA Student. At the cafeteria, I tried to drink as much water as possible to avoid drinking from plastic bottles. To minimize the number of trees that has to be sacrificed, I only used three sheets of paper while studying. During the afternoon, I desperately wanted to munch on a bag of chips but abstained from it, reminding myself of the challenge. After dinner, I threw away empty pencil leads and went to bed early since the trash-free experience was making me exhausted.

On my first day of the challenge, I was passionately dedicated to not creating any garbage. However, it wasn't as easy as I had thought. Plus, the fact that was a math quiz for the entire 23rd wavers next Monday made my challenge especially more stressful and demanding.

DAY 2: SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 2018

My parents came over this Sunday and we went out of the dormitory to eat the famous hoengseong hanwoo. In the restaurant, the table was covered with vinyl to prevent oil from splattering. Both wet and dry tissues were there, and the meat was packaged with vinyl and styrofoam. After eating at the restaurant, we went to a café to have some drinks. Although we drank the beverages inside, we were served with cups, straws, tissues and many more which were all disposable. Parcels were also a problem. To prevent our products from getting damaged, all parcels are packed with paper boxes or bubble wraps. Often times, the amount of protective material is superfluous, only creating extra trash.

DAY 3: MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 2018

I woke up in the morning and took some multivitamin pills that my parents gave me. Fortunately, I spent the rest of the morning without making a single piece of trash. Lunch was galbi, which created a massive amount of bare bones. At first, I was utterly shocked by the towering pile of bones that were thrown away. However, upon contemplation, I realized that eating meat inevitably creates a huge amount of bones. After school, I went to the practice for the school orchestra. This practice ended up in unexpectedly creating trash: some loose bow hair and resin powder.

DAY 4: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 2018

I tried to push myself to a tighter limit because what I did yesterday created so much garbage. To achieve my goal, I used a tumbler to carry water around with me. But I still needed some paper to take notes during classes. After dinner, instead of eating potato chips, I ate some bread from the cafeteria. That saved me from throwing away plastic wrappers.

CONCLUSION

As a conclusion, we agreed that reducing trash in KMLA is an imperative and devised three plans to achieve this. The first idea pertains to the issue of food waste. As for now, food, even when it is untouched by students, is thrown away it's already served on the platter. A better use for this food waste from the twelfth floor would be livestock feed or manure than a pile of trash dumped onto the landfills. The second idea is about water. Watching so many water bottles being thrown away, I theorized that the main cause of students resorting to bottled water is the unfiltered water provided by the school. Many students refuse to drink from water fountains because it tastes somewhat odd and "unfiltered". To change this, we need a better water purifying device to reduce the amount of bottled water consumed by students. The third idea is providing bread and cereal all throughout the self-studying period. When we return to school on the weekends, we feast on snacks brought from home to calm our grumbling stomachs– which generates a lot of trash. If we are provided something to eat from the cafeteria instead, we will be able to come back to school without bringing so much trash with us.

LIVING WITHOUT LOVE

Like always, Minjok wakes up to the scratchy beats thumping out of the speaker. Struggling to keep her eyelids from falling shut, she drags herself to the closet only to find her wardrobe quite empty. She recalls the vague memory of last week, shelving the laundry box – it has not come out still. A flash of annoyance swiftly dims away the morning light. There is no other choice than to wear the same clothes she had woken up in.

After the morning exercise, she mounts the elevator with her friends to have breakfast. The day's menu is chicken teriyaki on sticks. Waiting attentively, Minjok approaches the good-smelling section and becomes more and more nervous as she sees fewer teriyakis left. When it is her turn, she sees nothing but an empty tray. Someone shouts to the doors leading to the kitchen, "We ran out of chickens!" But there is no response. In fact, the glass doors are closed firm as they have been for some time now. Silhouettes are moving busily, but seldom do they seep out to where the students are. There is no more "Thank you for the meal" being shouted at the side nor the usual "You're welcome" in reply. There is only mean chatters of conversation, raucous giggles now and then, some munching of food, and the occasional dragging of food carts.

HERE IS NO MORE "THANK YOU FOR THE MEAL" BEING SHOUTED AT THE SIDE NOR THE USUAL "YOU'RE WELCOME" IN REPLY.

On the way to her advisor's office, Minjok steps into a muddy pool of melting ice on the way to the Dasan building. It has been there for weeks now. Streaks of hair and even dead flies had gathered. What a grump for a day, she cannot help but think, but it has turned into a daily norm, an everyday matter. She throws a disapproving glance at the filthy pool, traipsing to her advisor's office. The teacher had gone for a chat in another teacher's office, and there was a note on the board listing the notices as always. There were several heads down on the desks while others were statues poring down at books. Sighing inaudibly, Minjok sits down and hugs her bag. A sense of emptiness sweeps over and benumbs every inch of her mind, and not a single word can give a proper comment to the abrupt alienation. It seems there is simply too much to bear that day. It is Monday, after all.

Often times do we learn that no other kind of love can be compared to those of a parent. Living on a remote mountaintop, students in KMLA gain momentary freedom from the constant care and watch of their parents, yet in the meantime are deprived of their paramount love. Inconspicuous and underappreciated it may be, this love can be considered to be in its most powerful form. Being stripped of such unconditional love, we feel hollowness deep inside, as if something significant went missing. The spaces, however, are as well filled by the unsung lovers of our school: the cooking staff, the laundrymen, the janitors, and even the teachers. Living days without them will not only cause inconvenience but also make us recall an old-time lesson: "Do not take anything for granted – acknowledge the love around you." We have learned in our early ages the importance of appreciating little things that are more than often considered trivial. But if you really think about it, nothing is a matter of course, for there always are people working behind the veil of what is considered a "natural outcome." Love can be sought in a similar way. Because the concept has prevailed and is continuing to stay smeared into many parts of our everyday lives, people tend to take the idea for granted. But, do think for a moment if its presence is truly nothing to wonder at all. How would it be to live without love, especially in KMLA?

EDITORIAL

Tolstoy's renown quote goes–everyone thinks of changing the world, but no one thinks of changing him/herself. For KMLAians, KMLA is the world that we often aspire to change. Most of the times, the grievances that we have about the school merely hover in our minds. The vague hopes aren't crystalized nor actualized. Albeit rarely, KMLAians over the past years have achieved remarkable feats in rectifying flawed traditions and systems. We must remember that the trailblazers in KMLA history knew how to look beyond their personal interests, focusing on bettering the entire school community. The editorial crew of Minjok Herald presents five areas–the musical for sex education, student self-governing, morning exercise, delayed admissions, and the mandatory participation in the Minjok Music Festival–with the hopes that the readers would pay heed and initiate trailblazing changes for the better.

A MUSICAL FOR SEX EDUCATION, WAS IT HELPFUL OR TOXIC?

On August 16th, a musical made to educate students on the prevention of Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) was performed in the gym of Korean Minjok Leadership Academy. Though this event was held with the primary purpose to debunk common misconceptions about HIV patients and to prevent teenagers from contracting AIDS, the musical's evidently flawed content made many students doubt whether it was made for truly "educational" purposes.

First of all, the musical involved factually inaccurate information about AIDS. Throughout the performance, the actors repeatedly emphasized that "99% of the time spent together with HIV-positive people is perfectly safe," which implies that "the only thing you shouldn't do with HIV-positive people is get engaged in a sexual relationship." Yet ironically, this a common prejudice about HIV. The possibility of contracting AIDS after a single sexual relationship with a HIV-positive person is under 0.01%-0.1%, which is an extremely low rate. Not only that, if people use contraceptive devices, they will not be infected even if they have a sexual relationship several times. In fact, the possibility of being infected with AIDS virus through blood transfusion is over 90%, which is far higher than through a sexual relationship. However, the musical did not include such crucial information.

Also, the musical involved several comments that explicitly reflected twisted notions about sex and sexual stereotypes. One example is a male character saying a potentially offensive phrase that originated from Japanese pornography to a girl character while joking. This not only made the students watching the scene very uneasy, but also considering that there were no comments informing that those commonly used phrases harbor unhealthy and possibly offensive messages about sex, it was difficult to see that the musical was fulfilling its 'educational' purpose. Not only that, throughout the performance, the boy character alluded to the stereotypes that we have on the sex culture of foreign countries by stating, "Brazil is country with open sex culture and opinions, and people in Brazil are –" several times.

Lastly, the musical included scenes that can may normalize school bullying and watching pornography. In the musical, a girl character attempts to bully her friend who was dating with a boy she likes by spreading fake rumors about her friend. Even when such actions are apparently immoral, the play portrayed the event as if it were a natural course of action for teenagers. Also, the overall plotline of the musical seemed to imply that teens watching porn is something perfectly natural and acceptable. The male characters constantly used words from porn while conversing with girl characters, and at the end of the performance, one actor encouraged a student to respond to the question: "Why do people watch porn?" Considering that downloading, distributing and producing porn is strictly banned in South Korea, the musical's flow that regarded the access to porn as a natural stage of growth for everyone was inappropriate for all intents and purposes.

Every high school student must receive a proper sex education before they become fully grown adults. However, if the education is not done properly and does not provide any helpful information to the students, should students allot their limited time to get the unnecessary, inaccurate education? Though musicals are an effective way to make students focus on the content at hand, it is necessary to think again whether the musical conveyed accurate or toxic information for the students, especially on a topic as consequential as sex education.

TO MAKE A STEP FORWARD TO STUDENT SELF-GOVERNING

One of the most fundamental identities of KMLA is the self-governing system led by students. In KMLA, self-governing is not an exclusive characteristic of the student council. In fact, every single student participates in the process of running and modifying the school through activities in the student department. As soon as the freshmen enter the school, they are required to choose one among the fourteen different student departments. The selection is mostly based on the students' preference, but in case of departments where there are more applicants than the fixed quota, seniors conduct interviews to select the new members. Students who drop out of the interviews are automatically assigned to the less popular departments against their will. Since every student should each be working in one department, the system is often called the 'one-student one-department system'.

The one-student one-department system was originally created with the intention to enhance autonomy of the students. However, the skepticism toward the system has long been brought up; people doubted whether the system can actually contribute to the self-governing of the students. Thus, the issue has been actively discussed throughout the school for a long time. This September, it was selected for none other than an agenda of the first Assembly of Representatives of the semester. Besides, candidates of the 26th student council election received numerous questions about how they view the system during their question-and-answer sessions. Students, including the selected members of the 26th student council, those who oppose to the current one-student-one-department system can be divided into two categories: some who insist on abolishing the system itself and others who claim to enhance the existing system.

The first category of students argue that the department activities have lost the true meaning of self-governing since students are forced to perform a service for the school. Therefore, they say that the school needs to come up with a non-obligatory department system so that only those who are passionate can participate. Meanwhile, the second category claims that no matter how each student feels, the compulsory department system should be maintained, for it is in an extension line of a democracy education. The department activities gain significance only when every single student is under the school-affiliated organizations and directly takes part in school affairs.

According to the second category, there are not a lot of students who do not wish to participate in department activities; during the orientation period, all freshmen pleasantly consider which department to join in. Accordingly, the students who are actually "forced" to perform a service are mostly those who have failed to get into the department that they prefer. Thus, if non-obligatory department system is implemented, it would be impossible for the less popular departments to function properly. Nevertheless, the less popular departments still carry out essential tasks of the school. Therefore, the solution of the problem is to analyze the reason why there is a difference in popularity or satisfaction between the departments and to fix that, not to remove department activities from obligation duty of the students.

Then what are the causes of the preference difference between the departments? Students have pointed out that it is mostly due to excessive workload deviation and an unfair incentive system. Departments have distinct characteristics regarding the type and amount of the work they do. For instance, students under the Department of School Event Management spend numerous hours making rolling papers throughout the year, whereas the only significant task for the students under the Department of Education is to help organize the Dasan Symposium. Additionally, the amount of incentives given does not vary proportionally to the workload. One of the candidates of the 26th student council pointed out that there was a big gap between the incentive which students under two different departments received after doing similar tasks.

The first step to finding the solution of the problem is to identify its cause. All legislative and executive council candidates of this election came up with their own solutions about the matter during the election period, and those who got elected are starting to put their ideas into action. Consequently, a Department General assembly about the reorganization of the incentive system was held in September 28th. In order to resolve the one-student one-department controversy, the student council, leaders of each department, and every individual student should actively participate in the discussions and reach a concurrence. If all students pay attention to the problem and endeavor to come up with a fundamental solution, KMLA will be able to take a step forward to a genuine student autonomy.

THE INTERRELATIONSHIP BETWEEN MORNING EXERCISE AND INJURED STUDENTS

While walking around KMLA, one can often see students riding in electric wheelchairs or using crutches to walk. These days, there seems to be quite a lot of students with injuries in the ankle or knee. It is peculiar that among the considerable number of students who visit the infirmary in KMLA, those who hurt their legs take up the biggest portion. Therefore, Minjok Herald sought to find out what kind of factors peculiar to KMLA have impacts on the injuries of students.

There are many notable differences between KMLA and other Korean high schools, and morning exercise is one of them. There has always been criticism on how morning exercise increases the possibility of student injuries. Morning exercise has long been part of our tradition, conducted under the purpose of enhancing students' health and quality of life. Every six o'clock in the morning, students are required to engage in different types of exercise for thirty minutes. The freshmen go to either kendo or taekwondo, while the juniors jog to Changhui Hall and the seniors do gymnastic exercises in front of the dormitory. Since a majority of the students wake up just minutes before heading out, their bodies are still stiff with a hint of sleep and the impact of even a slight sprain could turn out to be serious. The dragging suits for kendo or taekwondo make the situation worse, since the freshmen trip on them every time they walk, run, or climb up the stairs. On top of that, the road leading to the gymnasium is rough with gravels stuck in random places, and a fall there could be quite critical. Some say kendo itself is a catalyst for those injuries, since many of its moves include balancing on one's ankles or pressing one's feet hard to the ground.

Is morning exercise really the reason for this phenomenon, or are there other factors more directly correlated? When Minjok Herald asked the school nurse for her opinion on this issue, she replied, "Morning exercise is part of the problem, but I believe that other factors are dominant. For instance, students get hurt while going up the massive hill or running down the stairs to go to honjeong. They also get hurt a lot during sports club activities as well. However, it is quite peculiar that there are certain periods in which a lot of students get injured in their legs or ankles." Though she partially denied that morning exercise is the direct reason why students get hurt, she admitted that there is a possibility that it might be a contributor to setting the basis for frequent injuries. One interesting fact was that the nurse didn't keep a list that kept track of injured students. There were some written records, but the school seemed to lack overall management of students that get hurt at school.

"Although the nurse stated that the interrelationship was not that strong, the numerous precedents of students getting hurt due to morning exercise suggests that the possibility should not be denied. In this context, more discussion would be needed on the subject among the students and teachers."

KMLA ADMISSIONS DELAYED

Being Alert To Potential Changes

With the government's pledge to abolish "elite" high schools such as foreign language, autonomous or special purpose high schools, Korean Minjok Leadership Academy is facing direct changes. The Ministry of Education has delayed the student admission period of KMLA 24th wavers to that of general high schools. Until last year, KMLA recruited students about a month or two before general high schools so that the students who dropped out could apply to a general high school in their region. However, with the new policy, this extra option disappears–if one applies to KMLA and gets denied, he or she will have to attend a random local high school that has vacant spots. The purpose of the alteration led by the Ministry of Education is clear: reducing the number of students applying for special purpose high schools like KMLA, which they hope will eventually culminate in the abolishment of special purpose high schools.

Although the delayed admission process will most directly affect students who will be applying to KMLA this year, it also has and will affect current KMLA students in numerous ways. One of the most significant effects has to do with the annual Minjok Music Festival. The Minjok Music Festival has always been a chance for newcomers to meet their seniors for the first time and get introduced to the diverse performing clubs of KMLA. Many students, especially 23rd wavers, have complained that one of the main purposes in why they practiced hard for the festival was to show their performances to the 24th wavers, and without this being possible, the festival does not embody much meaning.

Another significant change the new schedule brought to KMLAians is the delay of winter break. This might seem trivial at first glance, but taking a closer look, it effects the life of students quite significantly. Summer and winter break for KMLAians is more than just a time to rejuvenate, since many students use this period to do extracurricular activities and fill up any weaknesses in their studies. To spend a busy yet fulfilling break, most students arrange their schedule tightly beforehand. However, if winter break is delayed, the students will have to postpone, reschedule, or cancel some of their already organized plans.

So far, it seems clear that the new policy will have more negative effects than positive on most people related to KMLA. On the short-term, students applying for KMLA will have to make a tough decision between KMLA and local high schools. Students and teachers will need time to adjust to the effects the new policy will bring. In the long term, far more serious problems could arise, since as mentioned before, the ultimate goal of implementing this policy is to abolish special purpose high schools. If the number of students applying to KMLA reduces due to this policy, the position of KMLA in Korea's education system will be in grave danger.

The abolishment of special purpose high schools is a highly debatable topic. Some say special purpose high schools lead to unfair and heated education, while some question whether abolishing those schools will lead to better quality education in general high schools. Furthermore, is it justifiable to push the schools to postpone their admission process without the consent of the current students and faculty, not to mention those wishing to apply to the schools? There are so many questions left unanswered. However, despite the ongoing confusion, one fact remains clear: as students of a so-called elite school, facing direct changes due to this new policy, we should stay alert and speak up in times that our voices need to be heard.

MANDATORY PARTICIPATION IN THE MINJOK MUSIC FESTIVAL

MANDATORY TORMENT OR MEANINGFUL MEMORY FOR ALL?

As the second semester goes on, the Minjok Music Festival is coming up: many students are busy preparing for auditions, sometimes even skipping meals. As the Minjok Music Festival has always been the pride of KMLA, there are many clubs practicing passionately for the big stage in November - orchestras, bands, and most "popularly", the student choir. Though a lot of students in KMLA are involved in musical activities, some students are not part of these clubs. Reasons for this vary from student to student, but since all freshmen are required to participate – meaning to perform - in the concert, students who are not a part of a performing club automatically become a member of the choir.

Students, being unwillingly summoned to night practices during the first self-study period, complain that they do not see the point of mandating all students to participate in the Minjok Music Festival. A freshman who is currently a member of the choir told Minjok Herald, "to be honest, I do not want to do this. I would rather spend my time studying or in other club activities. Why do should we participate in something that we do not find interesting?" Choir practices are held every week, in which every member is required to attend, and every day starting two weeks from the concert. It sure does seem like students are spending a lot of time in choir practices. Here, one question arises: is it worth it?

Some students believe that participating in the concert itself could be a whole new experience for students. An anonymous 22nd waver stated, "Last year when I had to sing in the choir, I hated it. But looking back, it left me with some of the most memorable moments of KMLA life. It's impossible to feel or know it at the moment, but looking back now, I can feel it." According to Ms. Lim, the main purpose of mandatory participation in the Minjok Music Festival is to follow the school policy of fostering artistic talent in all students. KMLA is known for providing students of not only academic but also artistic and athletic experiences, which makes the school truly unique compared to others. That is why we take classes like Korean Calligraphy and gayageum, to acquire artistic attainments apart from academic ability.

Still, students protest that they do not feel the need to use their valuable time in singing in front of others while sacrificing their precious time to study. While there are students that find genuine joy and worth in partaking various performances, there are students that simply deem themselves misplaced up on the stage. The reluctance is especially shared among students that are forced to join the school choir as they have no alternative. Often times, those students do not view the concert as a festival nor an inclusive KMLA Family event, but rather a time-wasting distraction that bothers them from studying. It is urgent for the school to remind the students of the meaning of participating in Minjok Music Festival. Or else, it might be better to change the policy from mandatory to voluntary.

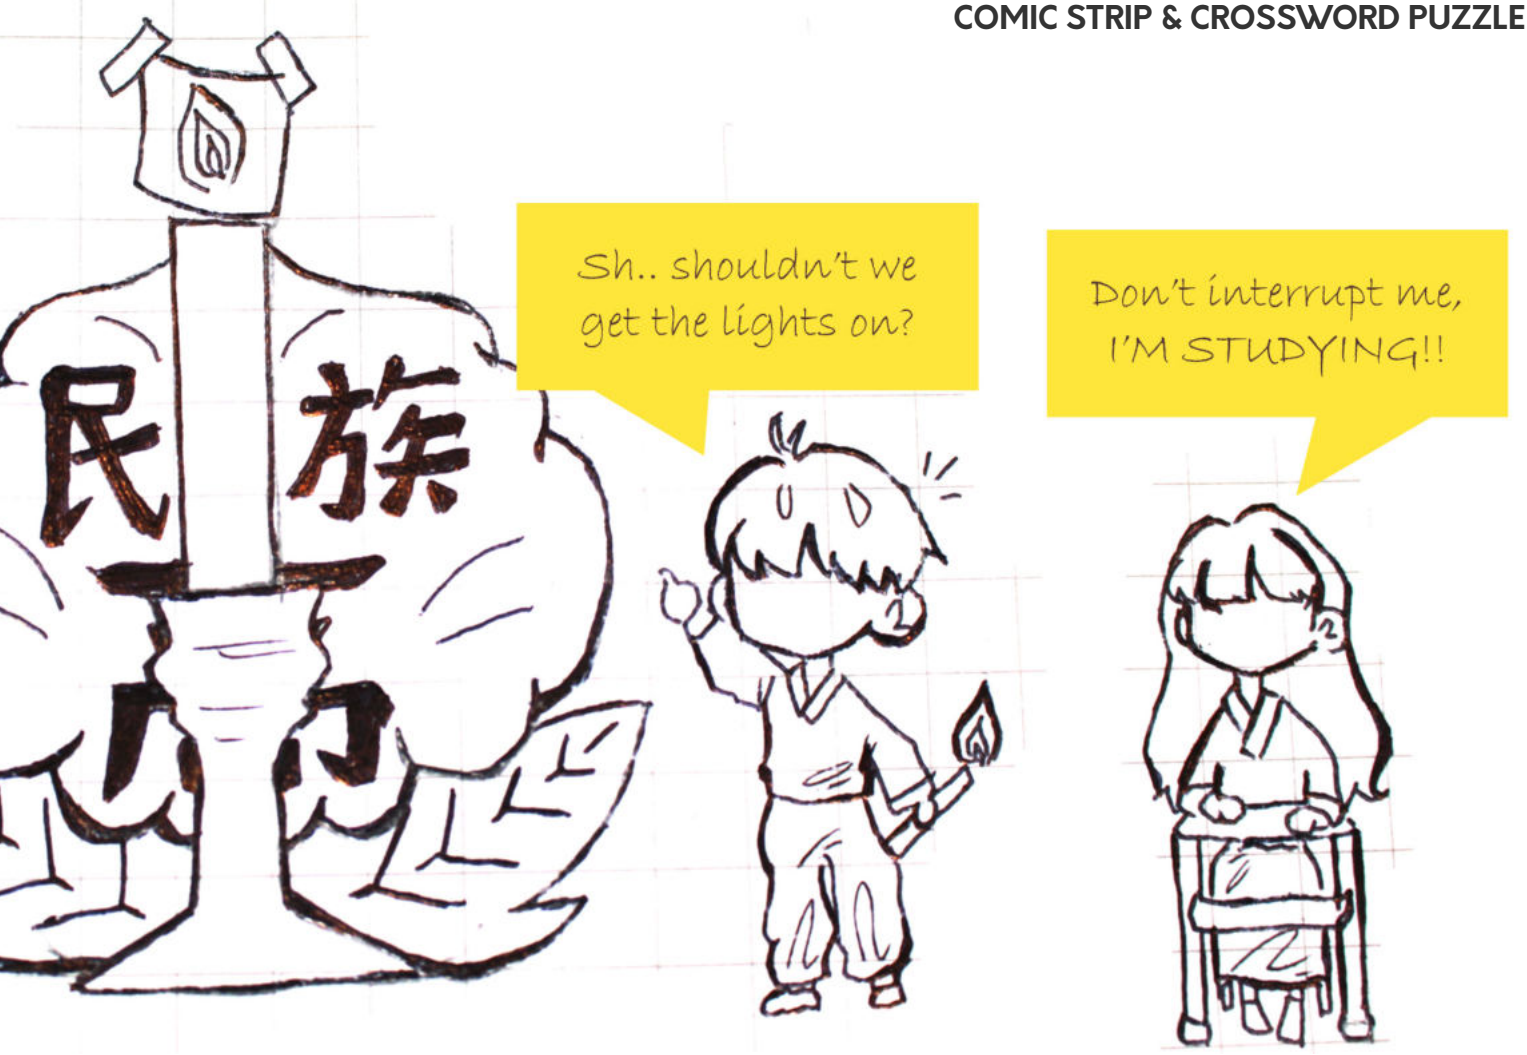

> "If students cannot see the value, there are no practical gains from forcing them to participate."

It seems that the school should acknowledge that while some may shine up on the stage, others may find the audience seats more comfortable.
